den, where they can grow ingredients for Elliott's French provincial-style dishes.

"With all the decisions, we wanted a house that was very utilitarian, in which everything had a purpose. We kept use in mind and kept our eyes open throughout the construction," Elliott said.

About the only thing that's not strictly utilitarian is the palette of colors. The couple did the painting themselves, using no-VOC paint in bright hues.

The industrial-look kitchen is asparagus green. The master bath is the hue of Thompson seedless grapes. Fragrant clove, a brownish orange, marks the living room and bedroom, with trim painted a color called "Cider Toddy."

Elliott and Pillsbury made the move in October, four months after commencing construction. And they love it.

As a chef, Elliott particularly likes the kitchen, which he designed with professional appliances, stainless steel counters, open shelving and a floor drain to ease cleanup of the stained concrete flooring. The kitchen is open to the rest of the downstairs area, so he can talk with guests while he's cooking.

Pillsbury loves many aspects of the house, including one that's not quite as public. "I really like the low-flow, dual-flush toilets," said Pillsbury, whose professional mission is water quality. "They were more expensive, but they really do use less water, and they're intuitive."

The Jacuzzi tub, a ReStore find, serves as a focal point in the master bathroom. A mosaic of river rock forms the trim.
